Hku courses online

The internet has democratized a lot of things since its birth, including learning previously only available with a hefty teaching check. College site Education Portal has a handy list of the colleges that offer the most comprehensive course material online, including open-course trailblazers like the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Tufts University, and programs like Stanford's lecture podcasts on iTunes U. You can't get a sheepskin for free, but you can promote your knowledge and education for less than even the price of a book. For much more college-based free learning, check out Wendy's comprehensive guide to .edu underground. Let's face it: there are a lot of low-quality, low-learning, boring online classes out there. But there are also some spectacular online courses that engage students and help them learn in ways that aren't always possible in a traditional classroom. Most of these top-notch online classes tend to share some common traits: Mediaphotos/Vetta/Getty Images Reading a generic textbook and answering fill-in-the-blank questions is not a natural way to learn, and good online classes stay away from such formal materials. Instead, they try to engage students with content that is a natural fit to learn about the subject. Here's a clever test to determine if the content is worthwhile: would a self-directed student interested in finding out more about the subject wanting to use this book, website or video if he or she knew about it? Would the content be something an expert on the subject would recommend to an interested stranger at a dinner party if asked? If so, it's probably the kind of content good online classes always include. Good online classes know how to pace the tasks, so students are neither bored nor overloaded at any given week. These courses are specifically designed so that plenty of time is devoted to working on larger projects and that smaller tasks keep students engaged in the meantime. The best online classes are created with community in mind. Students are welcome in the course and are welcome to interact with the instructor and their peers in a friendly atmosphere. There are several ways that the community can be created in online classes. Some include off-topic discussion forums where students talk about everything from last week's football game to their favorite recipes. Others encourage students to send real images as their avatar graphics or require students to complete group tasks. Strong communities help students feel comfortable taking risks and asking for help. No one wants to scroll through hundreds of pages of text documents - that's simply not how we're used to experiencing the internet. Good online courses improve learning by including videos, interactive activities, podcasts, and other multimedia elements. In order to make multimedia use a success, these elements must always have a solid purpose and must be a professional way (watch a home video of a professor adlibbing adlibbing on a topic is certainly worse than just reading the content as a very long text document). As much as possible, good online classes allow students to make their own decisions and take responsibility for their own learning. Some of the best courses allow students to create their own projects or focus on an element of the subject they particularly benefit from. These courses try to avoid being overly scripted and instead allow adult students to construct meaning on their own. What makes sense for the original course creator often doesn't make sense for students trying to navigate through an online course. Good courses are usually reviewed by several external parties to ensure that students can easily find what they need and work their way through the course without unnecessary confusion. Sometimes overloading a course with too many extras can be confusing for students. But it's still helpful to give students ways to learn more outside the prescribed curriculum if they choose to do so. Good online courses give students complementary ways to keep learning, but differentiate it from core content so students don't get overwhelmed. Not everyone learns the same way. Good courses appeal to visual, kinesthetic, and other learning styles by providing a wide range of multimedia content and carefully designed tasks to help students learn in the way that works best for them. It's sometimes tempting to overload a course with flashy tech items or to have students sign up for dozens of external services. But good online classes avoid this temptation. Instead, good courses include carefully selected technologies that are reliable and fully supported. This helps students avoid the panic that comes from encountering a required program that just won't run or a video that just won't load. Finally, good online classes usually tend to have something extra that gives them that additional oomph. It is clear that designers of the best courses think out of the box. They avoid giving students the same boring experiences week after week and surprise them with real opportunities to develop their thinking and grow as a student. There's no formal way to do this - it's the efforts of designers thinking about what works and carefully crafting content that makes learning meaningful.
